Advanced imaging modalities are often used in the evaluation of orthopedic injuries and assessment of sports-related injuries. These modalities are not well standardized across surgeons or radiologists, resulting in variation in the recommendations they provide. The purpose of this study was to perform a survey of current practices of orthopedic surgeons and radiologists regarding advanced imaging modalities. An online survey was conducted of all attending surgeons and radiologists in the department of orthopedics and the department of musculoskeletal imaging at Memorial Sloan Kettering Cancer Center during a 24-month period in 2018. Survey response rate was 77% (n=527) from a total of 868 orthopedic surgeons and radiologists. Of the respondents, 70% were fellowship-trained in musculoskeletal imaging. The majority of respondents indicated that they were comfortable ordering advanced musculoskeletal imaging modalities for postoperative evaluation. They are most comfortable ordering advanced imaging modalities for setting- or healing-related orthopedic injuries as well as instability situations. Only 33% of surgeons felt comfortable ordering advanced imaging modalities in the setting of acute trauma and only 37% of surgeons were most comfortable ordering advanced imaging modalities for the evaluation of hip fractures. Although the majority of musculoskeletal imaging specialists did not feel comfortable ordering advanced imaging modalities for acute trauma, more than half of them indicated that they would be comfortable ordering advanced imaging modalities for instability situations and for postoperative evaluation of hip fractures. The data analysis below focuses on the general patterns of investment and consumption growth in the EU over the past decades. It shows how levels of investment and consumption have changed with each other over time, and how these levels have been affected by economic and demographic trends, as well as by policymaking. To begin with, investment was growing rapidly in the late 1970s, as a result of the oil crisis, the post-war boom and the new social model of the Western world. After that, investment stagnated and started decreasing. However, consumption more-or-less kept growing in the 1980s and 1990s. From the 2000s on, both investment and consumption have gradually decreased.
