The Obama administration announced on Wednesday that it will unveil a series of tweaks to the Cuba policy, including new steps towards normalizing relations with the longtime adversaries. "These actions signal that the policies of the previous administration are over," a senior White House official told reporters at a briefing. "The United States is ready to move on." The next step in normalizing relations with Cuba comes after a series of announcements from the Obama administration in recent weeks. The United States officially restored diplomatic relations with Cuba last year, after more than 50 years, and now the U.S. is opening two more embassies in Havana, and extending the visa-free travel with the Cuban people. "We have to get rid of the embargo and get rid of the travel ban," said White House National Security Council Spokesperson Bernadette Meehan. "That really is a big step forward." The Obama administration was also hopeful that the Florida vote in November — on a constitutional amendment to overturn the Communist regime — would be successful in forcing the United States to re-evaluate its trade and travel with Cuba. In order to do so, it is now planning new initiatives, including the opening of a new embassy in Havana, the return of Cuban diplomats to Washington, the first U.S. commercial airline flights to Cuba and other measures. "We are aiming at commercial flights and further diplomatic activities in Cuba as soon as possible," said Secretary of State John Kerry. "This will be an important step." The senior White House official indicated that the administration is pleased with its new measures. "Both countries had sent mixed signals," she said. "Our message to the Cuban people is that we want them to have an equal relationship with us, and that is the same message that we are delivering to the Cuban government." Moreover, she added: "This policy is no longer about imposing a policy on a country
